Interesting Extranía

The Books of the Hours were extremely variable and typically personalized, especially for the wealthier patrons. Often things of personal significance were added (One patron added the stories of several saints as dividers to various sections of his books.) The Saints in the Calendar varied enough by region and person that they could be diagnostic for determining where a certain book was ordered or for whom. The structure was variable, to (as far as I've been able to determine) a lesser extent. The Hours of the Virgin were consistently present but could be in either the "normal" or "Advent" form. I've seen reference to some containing both, though have not found an example of such. The Sufferages (prayers to various people, saints, angels, etc.) vary the most both in quantity and who is prayed to. Which bible passages are selected seems to vary somewhat. The Psalms chosen don't seem to as far as I have seen. Very different from what we see today, the content was customized, not just the looks.
