Interesting Extranía

Today we are dipping into the rabbit hole that is the Saints. For the Calendar in the Book of the Hours, the Saints were very important. While most books of the hours had very specific things that pretty much never varied (Pascha/Easter, Christmas, etc.) which saint days were celebrated were quite varied, often the King of whatever country was included. The saints could be locatively relevant (You wouldn't see Joan of Arc in an English book of Hours, as a large-scale example). They could also be significant to the person. This could also influence content beyond just the calendar. One very wealthy patron had the lives of seven saints as essentially section dividers (Belles Heures of Jean de Berry). A carpenter or other craftsman might have both of St. Joseph the worker's days listed and might also have a suffrage to him in the back. An Englishman would likely emphasize St. George's feast. Simple and short Hours, say for above mentioned Carpenter would have fewer saints and suffrages (and indeed fewer parts and less customization) than a noble would, (Above mentioned Jean de Berry, Duc de Berry in France being an extreme example on the 'fancy' end.)
